Pit stop: The High Line's picturesque setting is perfect for post-gallery ruminating, or for budding photographers inspired by their gallery tour. Vincent Tullo for The New York Times

A Few More

Chelsea's cup runneth over at the moment; so here are some of my other suggestions. The inimitable John Bradford continues his raucous faux-naïve narrative renderings in "Hamilton, History, Lincoln and Paint" (through May 5 at Anna Zorina Gallery, 533 West 23rd Street; annazorinagallery.com). The paintings of Angelina Gualdoni, inspired by Gauguin and pre-Columbian ceramics, show new growth at Asya Geisberg Gallery (through May 12 at 537B West 23rd Street; asyageisberggallery.com). And Gedi Sibony has nearly filled Greene Naftali's ground-floor space with a large white cube turned inside out, using white-enameled metal panels familiar from kitchens. It's titled "The King and the Corpse." Its scale is regal; its funkiness sends up Chelsea's prevailing cleanliness (through May 5 at 508 West 26th Street; greenenaftaligallery.com).
